Alexandria Gazette

FRIDAY EVEN'G., NOVEMBER 10.

The Song of a Shirt. With face that was weary and worn, With eyelids heavy and red, Poor Morton sat, with a look forlorn, And dolefully seratched his head.

The bottles lay about, The returns were in the dirt, - And in a voice 'twix: a howl and a shout He sang this song of a shirt:

Flap! flap! flap! While even the boys do scoff, And tell me to wash the bloody shirt, And take the old thing off. 1ts Oh! for a light in the South, With backeteful of gote! How I could firm ish the shirt again.

And renew the status once more! Work! work! work! Till the brain begins to swim; I've worked upon that bloody shirt Till my eyes are heavy and dim. Seam, and gusset, and band-I've steeped them all in gore,

And the bloodier that I made that shirt The Hoosiers cheered the more. I stumped the State all through The bloods shirt to wave; But all my toil and great ado

Could not the "grandson" save. Despite of Chandler's eash, Flung out as free as dirt. A tidal wave has swept the State And washed the bloody shirt.

It's all well enough to talk, And say that my shirt's played out, But if that old stand-by is lost What can we talk about? And so, though the thing don't take, And rather seems to hurt, For one, I never shall forsake

The well-worn bloody shirt. With face that was weary and wore, With eyelids heavy and red, Poor Morton sat, with a look forlore, And dolefully scratched his head. His features oft would twitch, As if from thoughts that hurt; But still with a voice of dolorous pitch He sang this soon of a shirt. -Exchange.
